

Some at the Inauguration Ball.

Following is an extract from the speech of Congressman Stokes of Tennessee at the Inauguration Ball, March, 1865.

Have heard what took place at the ball given on the night of the second inauguration of Mr. Lincoln. There is a man here, probably who knows all about it. I have heard of people filed the names of the guests. The intellect, beauty, and grace of the nation were there. It was a glorious, august, imposing scene. The Vice President was too ill to attend, or sick, or something else. Mrs. Lincoln, as was customary, was in her position on such an occasion. Mr. Sumner had to wait upon the lady. I saw a colored man by his side, and he was a colored man by his side. I am Vice President of these United States! I've taken an oath to defend the Territory of Tennessee from the Territory of the Queen! I'm Vice President, and I'm from the Territory of the Queen. There he goes, with the Queen, and she is sitting with my colored friend. He is a better friend of the black race than I am. His is theoretical and practical friendship. Just look at the scene at the inaugural ball.

Want to Die the Death of the Righteous.

A correspondent of a Boston paper relates the following rather amusing story: A gentleman dropped into one of our churches, one day last week, to hear a sermon, and being a more thoughtful man, he modestly took a retired seat in the gallery. At the close of the sermon, the preacher requested "all the righteous to stand up." The man who would like to die the death of the righteous to stand up. The man who would like to die the death of the righteous to stand up. The man who would like to die the death of the righteous to stand up.

Barry Lamb.

Barry Lamb, the only companion and friend of Charles Lamb, has just published a charming volume, or rather personal recollections of the man, which is destined to great popularity among the many lovers of this dear and delightful humorist. Here is a sweet selection from its pages: "Lamb's name was extended to all things. I never met him speak spitefully of any author. I thought that every one should have a name, and that every name should have a name. I never met him speak spitefully of any author. I thought that every one should have a name, and that every name should have a name.

Dr. Taylor.

Dr. Taylor finds nothing lovable in the Missouri river. He says of it, in a late issue of the New York Tribune: "When one reaches the Missouri, there is little in that noblest of all rivers to attract one's attention. A single picture of the red tide of liquid yellow mud, with its long wall of cottonwood trees beyond, is sufficient to a panorama of the whole scene. For the seventy or eighty miles along which we skirted it, the turbid surface was unbroken by a sail, unbroken by the masts of a single steamer. Deserted, unpopulated, hideous, treacherous, with its forever shifting sands and snags, it almost repels the eye, even as it repels the nostrils."

Living Orators of America.

It is only a few years since Mr. Magoun published the "Living Orators of America," in which he assigns a distinctive appellation to each of the then most celebrated orators. The last of whom, General Cass, died in 1866. He called Mr. Webster the logician (died 1852); Mr. Everett the rhetorician (died 1865); Mr. Clay the politician (died 1852); Mr. Calhoun the metaphysician (died 1858); Mr. McDuffie the impetuous (died 1851); Mr. Cass the courteous (died 1866); Colonel Benton the magisterial (died 1858); Mr. Preston the inspired deacon (died 1860); and Mr. Corwin the national doctor (died 1865).
